

Is Taiwan A Country?

Yes. Taiwan meets all the conditions and characteristics of a self-determining nation-state under the Montevideo Convention 1933, which formally defines statehood as requiring:

- ✓ a permanent population
- ✓ a defined territory government;
and
- ✓ capacity to enter into relations with the other states.

Also feat.

Taiwan has its own ... currency, military, legal system, language(s), national Post Office, Coast Guard, national education, exams, and certification systems, own national health system, airspace and EEZ waters, national parks, Parliament and President, tax system, customs and immigration systems, own police force ...

“ We would urge the UK to seek to clarify and reform use of the CCP’s One China policy and take steps to multilaterally acknowledge then recognise the democratically elected government of Taiwan as the sovereign representative of Taiwan’s 23.8 million people. ”

Should Taiwan declare independence?

No. Taiwan is already an independent nation state and doesn't need to declare independence any more than India does from the UK. What Taiwan needs is for other countries to recognise the reality of its independence.

“

We would urge the UK to seek to clarify and reform use of the CCP's One China policy and take steps to multilaterally acknowledge then recognise the democratically elected government of Taiwan as the sovereign representative of Taiwan's 23.8 million people.

”